QUALITY CONTOL R NOTABLE TREND IN EGG BUSINESS

A noticeable trend toward more "quality control" of the egg from the hen house to the table is noted by Denver D. Bragg poultry specialist at VPI.

Indications of the trend, he says, are seen in the new "controlled quality" egg grading program, announced by the U. S. Department of Agriculture. The program, which will become effective September 15, provides for government certification of the quality of eggs which are produced and marketed under controlled conditions. The quality control factors specified include uniformity in age of the laying flocks, constant temperatures, and humidity levels, and quick handling.

Eggs handled according to these requirements and meeting the quality standards proposed will be eligible for either the U. S. Grade AA label or the new grade label designation, "Fresh Fancy Quality." Eggs meeting the standards for A quality also may be identified as having been produced under the quality control program.

Interior quality of such eggs will be measured by a new test which involves breaking representative samples and measuring the height of the albumen (thick white).

The quality control program has been used on a trial basis at several egg packing plants in different parts of the country during the past year and a half.

The present program for shell egg grading, which involves candling to determine interior quality, will be continued for those not using the quality control program.

Bragg also pointed to proposed changes in the voluntary egg products inspection program. Also announced by USDA, the amendment would require laboratory tests as a prerequisite to certifying to the wholesomeness of frozen whole eggs not produced under USDA inspection.

For a low-calorie cooler some hot afternoon, pour chilled beef broth over ice cubes and add a dash of worchestershire sauce.

Play safe — drive carefully.

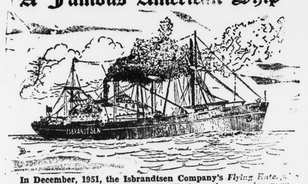
A Famous American Ship



In December, 1951, the Isbrandtsen Company's Flying Enterprise was en route from Germany to New York, on her regular run of the-world cargo run, when she encountered a gale in the English Channel. Continual battering of mountainous seas opened a hull crack amidship. Though Captain Henrik Kurt Carlsen ordered the crack cemented and sandbagged, it reopened continually. When rescue ships appeared in response to his SOS, Captain Carlsen directed passengers and crew to abandon ship, which was done without loss. He remained on board alone. Several times, single-handed, he secured a tow-line to the forepeak; but weather thwarted each tow effort. On January 10, standing with Kenneth Dancy, who had come aboard from the tug Turmoil, Carlsen sensed that his beloved ship would not make the safe haven of Falmouth. Reluctantly, after Mr. Dancy, he leapt from the smokestack of the vessel when she had come over practically on her side. Minutes after he was aboard the Turmoil, Flying Enterprise turned completely over and sank. Captain Carlsen's heroic stand against the elements, and his fond attachment to his ship, says the American Merchant Marine Institute, constitute one of the finest sagas of the sea, as well as an individual act of bravery and devotion to ship and duty rarely equalled in maritime annals.

YOUR MERCHANT MARINE

N. S. SAVANNAH

"America has the lead in atom power for ships. Let's keep it!" said Ralph E. Casey, president of the American Merchant Marine Institute, at the July 21 launching of the nuclear merchant ship Savannah.

Besides the Savannah, we have an atomic aircraft carrier, a destroyer, a cruiser and 33 submarines built or building. The private merchant marine industry must accept this responsibility of progress.

One American company, Esso Standard Oil, has already offered to build and operate a nuclear tanker, provided the Government contributes the power plant. A second American Line, Isbrandtsen, has proposed cutting one of its present ships in half and inserting an atomic power unit in a prefabricated hull section.

It is forward thinking like this which will give substance to President Eisenhower's prophecy that the N.S. Savannah will be the "forerunner of atomic merchant and passenger fleets which will one day unite the nations of the world in peaceful trade."
